Molesting since seminary, dumped into society 30 years later

Secular employer only learns about Job’s molesting past by reading about it in the newspaper

Like many of the other priests whose files were recently released, the Thomas Job file indicates questionable conduct with young boys for years before he was ordained a priest. In fact, Job was reported to have had inappropriate conduct with kids all during seminary and at each of his assignments as a priest, often taking boys to a cabin he owned with another priest.

Despite Job’s questionable history back to the 1960’s, it isn’t until 1983 that Job was under any kind of direct supervision (“monitoring”) and told that he was not allowed to be around children.

Monitoring doesn’t work. Throughout the 1980s, Job was still abusing kids and then writing his victims to apologize. The problem became so bad that the principal at one of the parish schools where Job worked quit her position because Job would not stay away from the children, and the Archdiocese refused to help her stop him. In 1987, Job requested a leave of absence for this emotional health—mostly due to fears about being exposed in the press. The Archdiocese supported Job, but stated in a confidential letter that they had full knowledge of the legal responsibility they had over him.

By 1988, when Cardinal Bernardin and Bishop Goedert assigned Job to St. Bede’s parish, they know that Job was still spending time with boys, videotaping sports practices and taking boys to his cabin in Fox Lake. Although Job told his supervisors that he had no contact with kids, the Archdiocese was still receiving reports that he was taking kids to his cabin for the next two years.

Job finally resigned in 1991 when the Archdiocese concluded that it was too risky for Job to remain a priest. Job still performed funerals and other sacramental duties, against the terms of his resignation.

Cardinal George only declared Job a priest “not in good standing” when Job’s employer called the Archdiocese in 2003 after reading about allegations against Job in the newspaper.

Job wasn’t laicized until 2010, a part of the “Vatican 400” — 400 child molesting priests laicized by Pope Benedict between 2010 and 2012.
